Nov 2, 2014 I have this software. It was in Italian and I only understand some %s of it because they are hard to translate. Do you understand it? Thank You!!

Q: In an app to encrypt data, how do I check who's copy of data I encrypt? Let's say I encrypt some data (20KB of data) with AES and HMAC256 in an app for iOS devices. How do I ensure that the data hasn't been modified? Like if someone copies my app and uses a completely different data they have access to, how do I detect it? And how do I actually check to see if the data has been modified?

A: What you want to do is include another piece of data into the ciphertext that contains the master key. Then, when you check the data, you check that this data is included in the encrypted version. If it is, then you know that the data in the encrypted form has been modified. A: There are many things to keep in mind here: Of course, you need to be aware that at least one person has the key to decrypt your data. You should not expect that every software comes with an adequate license for your data, i.e. you need to demand that all applications have a fair license for your data. This should include the apps of the jailbreaker/modder. You should be aware that all applications might not even be bound to be software at all and might just be a binary with hardcoded encryption keys. In this case, you cannot even assess that the data has been modified. You might need different verification methods. You can encrypt a single file as Bruce Schneier recommended here (page 5). You might need single files and not every folder to be encrypted and you can always encrypt a single file multiple times. However, the bad news is that if you are not able to check the data before you decrypt it, you might not have any way to check if the data has been changed afterwards. Of course you can fix this by adding new checks. But this won't prevent a modder/jailbreak/etc to change the data afterwards. The only thing you can do here is to distribute your data as encrypted files in the first place (make sure the encryption is done as strongly as possible and you shouldn't rely on some random person's malware to be able to find the key f678ea9f9e
